The California Center on Teaching Careers launches new statewide campaign to recruit school support staff

While the teacher shortage in California is well known, there is another staff shortage facing the state's schools. Classified staff positions are also going unfilled – positions such as teacher aides, mental health workers, cafeteria workers, and bus drivers.

A national survey of school district leaders by the RAND Corporation showed that nearly 60% of school districts had a shortage of bus drivers. In California alone, there are currently nearly 500 openings for bus drivers and over 500 openings for paraprofessionals. About a third of schools across the country reported custodial staff vacancies last school year, according to data from the Institute of Education Sciences, and over 100,000 mental health workers are needed nationwide to meet the levels recommended by experts.

To address the shortages, the California Center on Teaching Careers (the Center), housed within the Tulare County Office of Education, recently launched a statewide campaign entitled "Be Their Joy" to spotlight the need for and importance of school support staff. Located at www.betheirjoy.org, the campaign highlights open support staff positions across the state and offers key application information to job candidates.

"School support staff are often the first and last adults children see every day at school, so their roles are so important," said Tim Hire, Tulare County Superintendent of Schools. "The impact they can make on children as caring, encouraging adults can be immeasurable. We know that by providing the tools to help interested candidates connect with districts, we can create better functioning schools that make for better learning environments."

The "Be Their Joy" campaign follows the Center's successful "We Want You" teacher recruitment campaign that was launched in 2022.
